Location, Location, Location: The role of Geography on Public Opinion and Political Participation

Why do people react differently to similar events, with the only caveat being that one happens far away while the other happens at their “doorsteps”? How does distance shape our behaviors and opinions about an event, object, social group, or situation? This talk will present my current work at geographic distance, its scope, and its impacts on people’s opinions and behaviors. In the talk, I will lay out how distance interacts with other attitude-determinants (e.g., partisanship and sociodemographic characteristics, among others) to understand how individuals react to similar events, places, or groups of people, given how close or far away from the self these are.

November 3rd, 2022 12:00pm

To register click https://links.asu.edu/CLAPR102022

Jeronimo Cortina

Associate Professor of Political Science
Director, Faculty Research Initiatives,
University of Houston-
Population Health

Center for Latina/os and American Politics Research
Arizona State University